Climbing Documentary

The film was shot over the course of a few weeks in the Dolomites, Italy, following a small team of climbers exploring less-traveled routes. The project focused on quiet moments as much as the climbs themselves: early mornings, long approaches, and time spent waiting for the right light on the wall.

Nikolai worked as a camera operator, documenting both the movement on the rock and the life around it. The team consisted of two climbers and a small support crew, keeping things simple and flexible. Most of the filming was done on lightweight gear, often carried during the climbs, allowing for a more intimate and immediate perspective.
